Dear Alert Service Subscriber,
This is a critical short-term view:

All of the background remains much the same as our previous central bank disappointment views, and we refer you back to Wednesday morning's analysis for that extensive discussion.

Here's the critical consideration today: And the response to a still very accommodative FOMC last week Wednesday was fairly subdued prior to the disappointment with the BoJ's lack of action Thursday morning. That saw the June S&P 500 future slip below 2,075-78 key support by late Thursday.

There already appeared to be a real problem with the near-term up trend of June S&P 500 future last week, as it failed to make any more extensive progress above the 2,078 major weekly chart channel UP Break from two weeks ago.

And the failure back below 2,085 and 2,075 Thursday into Friday was especially telling after so much ambivalent churn during what should have been a stronger phase. That is especially so with the lower of them also a Tolerance below that 2,078 major weekly chart channel UP Break. That represents a 'Negation' of that UP Break, leaving the higher zone as formidable resistance... confirmed by Tuesday's weakness after Monday's squeeze right up into that area.

Now also below next lower critical support into the 2,060-55 area gap higher from two weeks ago means it appears to be headed into an even more major selloff once again. Next lower supports are 2,035-32 and the more major 2,020-10 range. However, the failure to firm up into the 2,100 area once again very possibly also presages the next major selloff into the 1,900 or even the mid-low 1,800 areas... or even lower ground.
