Dear Alert Service Subscriber,
This is a critical short-term view:

The 'Goldilocks' equities psychology reinstated on weak US economic data since the Jackson Hole Policy Symposium had been reinforced by almost all economic data since then. Please our previous ALERT!! emails of the past week-and-a-half for more specifics on those macro factors.

In any event it all culminated in the FOMC holding steady Wednesday afternoon as we expected, instead of the 25 basis point rate hike the hawks had wanted. While there was more dissent than usual, Fed Chair Yellen laid out reasons why this week was not the time to hike. Those were reinforced by the additional downgrades in the Fed projections, which finally put them roughly in line with the much more dovish sustained 'Street' psychology.

And equities responding well to 'Goldilocks' return was no surprise whatsoever.

This is the critical consideration (somewhat the same as previous):

Given the weekly Oscillator shift up to 2,175-80 two weeks ago, the 2,185 interim September S&P 500 future congestion was very important in the short term, as we had seen all week two weeks ago prior to the late week failure. After sagging back below the 2,185 on ECB disappointment, 2,160-55 was the key.

That more critical 2,155 level also failed on that Friday's impromptu Brainard speech announcement fears, which led to the December S&P 500 future violation of nominal early August 2,141.50 trading low support. That fomented the selloff into more prominent 2,120 and 2,105-00 congestion areas.

It is also still relevant that December S&P 500 future stalled at no better than the 2,155 area on the following Monday's sharp recovery. Yet after hanging around 2,141.50 all week this week prior to the FOMC decision, it strengthened from there once Chair Yellen provided more comfort during her press conference, As noted Wednesday morning, on balance, any lack of an FOMC rate hike would be constructive for the US and other equities. And so it is.

Wednesday afternoon's recovery back above 2,155 area is a key indication of the market's ability to ratchet back up into the higher trading range once again, and reinstates it as key near-term support. 2,185 remains the next key congestion and weekly Oscillator resistance. The extended Oscillator resistance is not until the 2,215 area this week, rising to 2,220 next week.
