Dear Alert Service Subscriber,
This is a critical short-term view:

Advantage Clinton. That seems to be the verdict of neutral observers after Monday evening's US Presidential debate. And we grudgingly agree.

While we are not at all convinced that Secretary Clinton's proposals on various fronts are the best way forward for the US and broader world, she won on two fronts. The first was her sticking with the aggressive presentation of her program while she managed to accomplish her team's debate goal of baiting Donald Trump into being more so reactive to criticism than pushing his vision.

The second was the inability of Mr. Trump to pounce on multiple openings where she was vulnerable when the debate came around to topics like cyber security (where he could have refocused on her emails), nuclear proliferation (where the Iran nuclear deal could leave the door open to them spreading the weapons access to terror groups in future), and so on through many topics.

He also failed to be more pointed on well-established economic history that her tax hikes, increased regulation, mandatory minimum wage increases, etc. will NOT grow the US economy. Yet we conclude this atypically lengthy macro background section with this market activity question:

If the equity markets sold off aggressively from Friday into Monday (and govvies rallied) on the fear of 'trade deal smasher' Trump possibly broadly winning the debate, why are the equities weaker and govvies higher in the wake of what was at least a nominal victory for Secretary Clinton?

This is the critical consideration:

We have already reviewed at length the importance of the 2,160-55 area due to the lead contract S&P 500 future swings out of mid-July through early September.

As such, the previous December S&P 500 future violation of nominal early August 2,141.50 trading low support was telling, leading to the test of the more prominent 2,120 and 2,105-00 congestion areas that remain major lower supports.

It is also relevant now that December S&P 500 future stalled at no better than the 2,155 area in early September and again on the rally in overnight trading into this morning. Weakness back below 2,141.50 again is important, as that was also the area it hung around last week prior to the FOMC decision, only strengthening once Chair Yellen provided more comfort in her press conference.

Will it hold once again be able to push back above 2,155-60 after the debate? Or is another test of those key lower supports on the way? We shall see.
