Subject: ROHR ALERT: HOLIDAY NOTICE and Current Analysis

This is a reminder of our HOLIDAY NOTICE.

As mentioned on Friday, in light of the degree to which last week's central bank influences are out of the way with little market response, we are taking off the first part of this week to prepare for the more major late month data releases from the end of this week into next week.

Yet it does appear that the better European Advance PMI's have assisted the US equities in surmounting the resistance that has restrained it for the past week-and-a-half. The question now is whether it can post a US daily Close above that area. If so, a test of the higher mid-September through early October resistance is likely in order. If not, the same lower levels will still apply.

So continue to finesse your market involvement based on levels noted below.

This is (still) the critical consideration:

We had already reviewed at length the importance of the mid-July through early September 2,160-55 low end of the trading range that was subsequently violated by the lead contract S&P 500 future. The December S&P 500 future did manage to recover sharply from September 12th overnight trading below the 2,120 support down to near the much more major 2,105-00, yet failed back up around the 2,155 area on that Monday's Close. And the subsequent rally failures into that area finally took their toll on the 'Fear of Fed' potential noted last Wednesday morning.

While the failure below 2,141.50 area stalled on the rally, it was not necessarily all that negative until violation of 2,120 a week ago Thursday morning. That pointed to that Thursday's test of more major 2,105-00 area that the market neared prior to rallying back strongly. Also now back above 2,120 means 2,141.50 area (with a Tolerance to 2,136 if it is above it) will remain key area again this side of 2,155-60.
